PREFACE.

In compiling the Handbook to the Order of the British Empire the object of the Editor has been to extend and give permanency to the scattered records of those who have been admitted to the Order in recognition of "important services to the Empire" in the hour of its greatest need. Of the origin of the Order at "a moment of almost unrelieved gloom," when "the entire British nation was fully mobilised for war," the story is told in the introductory article which follows, where it is shown that "the Order of the British Empire is in the truest sense of the word the British Democracy's own Order of Chivalry."

From the nature of the circumstances in which it was evolved, it was inevitable that this Order should become, almost at a leap, the most numerous of all Orders of Knighthood in this country. But numbers are only relatively large or small, and of the millions of citizens who were mobilised in military and civil capacities, only some 25,000—of whom nearly half were naval and military—were singled out for decoration with the Order of the British Empire.

The historical interest attaching to the Order made it desirable that some permanent record should be provided, and it has been the endeavour of the Editor to supply a memorial worthy of its subject.

In these pages will be found a full list of those who have been admitted to the Order, arranged in order of precedence under their respective classes. Also as many biographical notes as possible are given; but so many addresses are lacking, even in the official records, and so many others have been changed and are now untraceable, that in many thousands of instances it has been impossible to get in touch with those concerned in order to obtain the necessary particulars.

It was originally intended to publish only one edition of the Handbook, as it was thought that subsequent additions to the Order would not be sufficiently numerous to justify a reprint. But with so many biographical gaps it may be found desirable to re-issue the volume later, and those concerned, whose biographies do not now appear, are invited to communicate with the Editor with a view to the inclusion of particulars concerning them in any further edition.

That this Handbook will be of lasting interest as a memento of the Great War there is little doubt. It is hoped that it will prove also of considerable value as a reference book, covering ground hitherto barely touched in other publications.

The thanks of the Editor are due to the Officials of the Order who have rendered much practical assistance in a difficult undertaking.

February 19, 1921.

THE ORIGIN OF THE ORDER OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

"The Most Excellent Order of the British Empire" was instituted by Letters Patent under the Great Seal on June 4, 1917. The Great War was at its height, and there was no prospect of its early conclusion. It was, indeed, a moment of almost unrelieved gloom and disappointment for the Allies. The strategical offensive of the spring had broken down. The brilliant tactical victory of the British at Arras had led to no result. General Nivelle's big French offensive on the Aisne had failed decisively. Revolutionary Russia was beginning to fade out of the war in disastrous collapse. At Salonica there was deadlock; at Gaza the British advance on Jerusalem had been checked with heavy loss. At home the dreaded figure of starvation seemed to be on the point of appearing, for the intensive submarine campaign was in full swing, and our food-ships were being sunk in increasing numbers all round our shores. The one bright star was the entry of the United States into the war, but her armies had to be raised and equipped, and the day of their effective help was distant. Such were the grave conditions, though realised, perhaps fortunately, by few, when the King declared his intention of instituting a new Order of Knighthood.

And yet from this broad picture of the situation in midsummer, 1917, has been omitted the one great dominant group of facts in the very foreground which made the institution of this Order a necessity. The entire British nation by that time was fully mobilised for war. With the exception of an infinitesimal fragment of the population, all were harnessed to its remorseless wheels. The war had become an intimate part of everyone's life. Its demands were inexorable and insatiable. From the very beginning it had taken the best. It now took the second best, the third best, and the indifferent. All the energies of the State, all the energies of industry, all the energies of individuals were directed towards the carrying on of a devouring and devastating struggle, which some day—but no one knew when—was to end in the victory of the Allies, because on victory the will of the British people was firmly and immovably set. This unconquerable will to victory on the part of the British people is, next to the heroism of the British soldiers and sailors, the proudest memory of the Great War. Firmly founded on the unshakeable conviction that the cause of the Allies was the cause of Right, the British people—again we may ignore the waverers, and the timid, and the base—were resolved to go on to the end, cost what it might, and snatch the ultimate victory even out of the very jaws of starvation and defeat. There was little or no distinction between men and women. The womanhood of the country was marshalled and mobilised as never before, and showed an equal courage and an equal endurance with the men, and that great outstanding fact was not forgotten by those who framed the Statutes of the Order of the British Empire.

Such were the conditions to meet which the new Order was instituted, for in a nation thus mobilised for war service how else could just recognition be made of those who were rendering signal service to their country? "It is ordained"—so runs the Sixth Statute—"that the persons to be admitted to the Civil Division of the said Order shall be such persons, male or female, as may have rendered, or shall hereafter render, important services to our Empire." Important services—that was, and is, the sole qualification. Eighteen months later, on December 27, after the war had been won, a Military Division of the Order was added; but the original object of the Order was the recognition and encouragement of the non-combatant war worker, who was doing his and her best to keep the fighting services working at their utmost capacity and to look after the well-being of the fighting man at home and at the front, in the ranks and in hospital, wherever he might be, and serving in whatever capacity.

It is in this respect, therefore, that the Order of the British Empire differs in the circumstances of its inception and in the scope of its design from any other Order of Chivalry instituted in this country. In most of the earlier Orders there had been a strong element of exclusiveness, though the idea of equality within the Order had sometimes been emphasized. For example, in the Order of the Garter, though possibly in theory the door was open to any knight of stainless chivalry, in practice it was fast shut to all save those of noble birth and the highest social distinction. Indeed, it soon came to be an unwritten, but no less essential, qualification for admission to the Order of the Garter that the candidate should be "a gentleman of blood," which signified "three descents of noblesse, that is to say of name and arms, both of his father's side, and of his mother's side." And so it has remained down to our own times; for the admission even of a statesman so eminent, and a commoner so bene natus, as Sir Edward Grey (now Viscount Grey of Fallodon), was an event without parallel since the case of Sir Robert Walpole.

As is well known, the circumstances in which Edward III. came to institute the Order of the Garter are very much disputed by historians, though the historian of the Order, Sir N. H. Nicolas, declared confidently enough that there can be no reasonable doubt that "the illustrious Fraternity was intended to supersede the Round Table which Edward had revived, that it had no loftier origin than a Tournament or Hastilude, and that its Name, Badge, and Motto were derived from no nobler source than a fair Dame's misfortune and a chivalrous Monarch's gallantry." Accepting, therefore, the traditional story of the Tournament and Tilting at Windsor, and the slipping of the Countess of Salisbury's garter at the Ball, could there be a more poignant contrast than that between the Courtly Play of Spears, a Royal Gathering, out of which grew the Most Noble Order of the Garter, and the Bloody Tourney of the Nations of the World, known as the Great War—where the combatants were numbered by millions, and the stakes were Thrones, Dominions, Principalities, Powers, and even human Liberty itself—out of which arose the Order of the British Empire?

It would be easy to heighten this contrast still more by tracing the origins of some of the other great historic Orders of Chivalry. The Order of the Golden Fleece, for example, was instituted at Bruges in 1429, by Philip II., Duke of Burgundy, on his marriage with Isabel of Portugal; the recent downfall of the Hapsburghs has presumably brought the Austrian branch of that proud Order to a sudden end, though the Spanish branch still remains. The Motto of the Order of the Annunziata—"F. E. R. T."—still recalls, by the capital letters of the legend "Fortitudo Ejus Rhodum Tenuit," the relief of Rhodes by Amadeus V. of Savoy. Or, if we look to our British Orders, even as late as 1725, when the Order of the Bath, based on the old Knighthood of the Bath, was instituted for the reward of both civil and military merit, membership was limited to thirty-six Knights, and it was not until after Waterloo that the Order was enlarged to three classes "for the purpose of commemorating the auspicious termination of the long and arduous contest in which the nation has been engaged." Even so, the Bath retained much of its old exclusiveness until it was extended again in 1847 by the inclusion of the new ranks of Civil Knight Commanders and Companions. The Order of St. Michael and St. George shows a similar expansion. Originally instituted in 1818 for natives of the Ionian Islands (then under the British Crown) and Malta, and others "holding high and confidential situations in the Mediterranean," the Order was reconstructed in 1868, and again in 1877, when it was declared to be intended for those who held high office in the "Colonial possessions" of Great Britain, and again in 1879, when its ranks were thrown open to those who had rendered "good service to the Crown in relation to the Foreign Affairs of the British Empire."

In contradistinction to all these, the idea of the Order of the British Empire was conceived on a grand inclusive plan, and was brought into being with five classes, so that from the outset it might be all-embracing and fully comprehensive, and on a scale reasonably commensurate with the magnitude and universality of the services to be recognized. The only other British Order to possess five classes is the Royal Victorian Order, instituted in 1896, which ranks immediately above that of the British Empire, though nearly all Foreign Orders possess the five classes, which have been justified by practical experience. At the head of the Order are the Sovereign and the Grand Master, who is either to be a Prince of the Blood Royal or "such other exalted personage as the Sovereign may appoint." The first to be appointed to the Grand Mastership, with rank as First or Principal Knight Grand Cross, was the Prince of Wales. The five classes are as follows:—

I. Knights Grand Cross and Dames Grand Cross.
II. Knights Commanders and Dames Commanders.
III. Commanders.
IV. Officers.
V. Members.

Each class consists of two sub-divisions, Military and Civil.

Each sub-division consists of Ordinary and Honorary Members, the latter being foreigners on whom the distinction of being received into the Order is conferred.

Persons not being members of, or eligible for appointment to, any of the five classes may be awarded the Medal of the Order, either Military or Civil.

In each case, whether for Membership or for the Medal, the qualification is the same—the rendering of important service to the Empire. In practice, the award of the Medal is limited to cases of courage, self-sacrifice, or great devotion to duty. Among the first list of Medallists, for example, were many munition workers who had shown great courage and presence of mind in extinguishing fires in explosive factories, shipwright divers, electrical fitters and drillers, who had executed important repairs in the Grand Fleet during action, and workers of all ranks who had shown "great devotion to duty." One man was thus rewarded who, though 72 years of age, returned from Australia, at his own expense, to his old firm, put in for two years an average of 54 hours a week, and though he often fainted at his work "refused to go home, stating that he could not rest whilst he thought his country wanted shells." His name was Thomas Harper.

The great innovation of the Order of the British Empire—and of the Companionship of Honour which was instituted about the same time—was the inclusion of women side by side with men. Never before had there been full admission of women to all degrees of any important Order of Knighthood, and the innovation coincided with the acceptance by the British Parliament of the principle of Women's Suffrage. As has been already said, the womanhood of the country had been mobilised for war service, not indeed as completely as its manhood, for in the circumstances of the case that was impossible, but with no trace of compulsion, for whatever services women performed they performed voluntarily. Theirs, however, was a service absolutely indispensable to victory, and it was rendered with cheerfulness, thoroughness, endurance, devotion and efficiency beyond all praise.

The idea of the admission of women to an Order of Knighthood was far older than most people knew, and curiously enough it was the most exclusive of all the ancient Orders of Chivalry which had given them the largest privileges. Soon after the institution of the Order of the Garter we find a sort of quasi-admission of ladies of high rank, who were presented with Robes of the Order of the Garter, and who wore the Badge of the Order on their left arm. Between 1376 and 1494 some sixty ladies received this signal mark of distinction, and they were usually known as "Dames de la Fraternité de St. George." Several monumental effigies survive showing these ladies wearing the Garter, and in one or two cases apparently (e.g. that of Margaret, wife of Sir Robert Harcourt) the adornment was placed on the recumbent figure without the lady having had any strict right to wear it in life. The last entry in the Register of the Order of this gift of the Robes was in connection with Elizabeth, wife of Henry VII.—the Princess Bessy of the old Ballad—and then for some unknown reason the graceful custom was allowed to die out. There was considerable talk of its revival about 1730—not long after the institution of the Order of the Bath—but the idea was not carried out.

At the time of writing, the Order of the British Empire has a total membership in all its various classes of 25,419, the Military members numbering 11,646, and the Civil, 13,773. The Knights and Dames Grand Cross number 94; the Knights and Dames Commanders 537; the Commanders 3,173; the Officers 11,369; and the Members 10,246.

The numbers are large compared with those of any British Order, but they are not so large when one considers what an extensive use was made of the Military sub-divisions to make suitable recognition of the services of large numbers of officers who performed during the war multifarious duties of an indispensable, but in many cases of a non-combatant, character; and above all when one remembers that the whole nation was mobilised for war, and that even the most ordinary industrial occupations took on during the Great War a special war significance. The War overshadowed everything; new values attached to conduct, which became good or bad according as it was helpful or the contrary towards the achievement of victory; public spirit was shown in a thousand different ways as men and women surrendered their own careers and ambitions, and became parts of the Great Machine which existed only for the purpose of keeping our armies and our fleets in the highest state of efficiency. While warfare itself became more pitiless, and the engines of destruction more frightful, the spirit of chivalry spread through all classes, and a nobler idea of the beauty of public service penetrated all ranks alike. Democracy, thus animated, won the war; the Order of the British Empire is in the truest sense of the word the British Democracy's own Order of Chivalry. All classes are blended therein; the old distinctive qualification of being "a gentleman of blood" has gone and left no trace; service is the only test of admission, and the service of women here finds recognition in exactly the same way as the service of men. The newest and latest-born of the British Orders of Chivalry may therefore well be proud of its long list of members, and of the vast unnumbered host of war workers—unrecognised in the way of honorific distinction, but not unappreciated—whose representatives they are.

STATUTES OF THE MOST EXCELLENT ORDER OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE.
